

Monday 30 September 2013

Ovarian Hyperstimulation Syndrome (OHSS) is a potentially serious complication of some fertility treatment. Our team at Cambridge IVF has internationally-recognised expertise in preventing and treating this condition and are at the forefront of educating fellow professionals in this area. We are delighted that the British Fertility Society has published new guidelines in the journal Human Fertility on managing women who develop OHSS. These guidelines, which were written by Raj Mathur and Bee Tan, are the most up to date and recent evidence-based resource on this topic. These guidelines will be an invaluable resource for doctors and nurses looking after patients with this distressing condition. See the article here.

If you are a professional unable to access the article, please contact Cambridge IVF.